TRILANTIC Provides Convenient Access to EU Data Protection Rules

International law firms and corporations require thorough understanding of European Union rules if they are contemplating document collections in Europe

London February 20, 2008 - TRILANTIC, a leading UK-based electronic discovery specialist, announced today that the data protection rules for each country in the European Union are now posted on the company's website, www.trilantic.co.uk for easy reference by U.S. based law firms and corporations engaged in international litigation or regulatory cases.

Founded in 2005, TRILANTIC provides electronic discovery services to international law firms and corporations. The company recognizes the need for easier access to information about the important distinctions between data protection rules within each EU Member State. In an effort to help better educate their clients on these differences, TRILANTIC provides specific details related to what steps must be taken prior to document collections and what must be done prior to shipping,.

TRILANTIC's Managing Director Nigel Murray states, "With European data collections becoming more common for both litigation and regulatory matters, providing this information on the important area of EU data protection is another example of our commitment to our clients and in fact, the litigation support industries both in the UK and the US." Murray was a founder of the litigation support industry in Europe and has taken a significant role in educating legal professionals on international litigation issues.
